Baseball talks continue

NEW YORK (AP) — Today's start of the major league baseball season is nothing more than a day off for negotiators in the labor dispute that threatens to halt the season just before the U.S. Memorial Day weekend.

Talks will resume Thursday between the two teams of negotiators, led by Marvin Miller, executive director of the players' association, and Ray Grebey representing management.

Meditor Kenneth Moffett took a positive view of Tuesday's 4¼ hours of negotiations, the second of seven scheduled meetings over the next three weeks.

"The feeling was cordial between the parties," he said. "I'd say it was constructive. I would not suggest a tremendous amount of progress was made."

That seemed to concur with Miller's view. The union chief said the session was concerned with management's first tentative responses to altered player proposals which were placed on the negotiating table March 18.

PROPOSALS ALTERED

Those altered proposals included a new ceiling on minimum salaries, dropping the players' demand from one-third of the average salary to a lower figure, and a five-year waiting period for a player becoming a free agent down from the current six-year welt but up from the originally-proposed four years.

"Their response was, 'Do you have any lower figures we might consider?'" Miller said. "Well, we made the counter-proposals. It was their responsibility to reply to them, to make a counter-offer to them."

There has still been no discussion of compensation for teams losing free agents.
